Pain Management Pain Management Resources

Pain Resources for the Hawaii Practitioner

Pain management is often complex and always multifactorial. Culture, emotional state and previous pain experiences all play a part in a person's response to a painful stimulus. Since these and many other factors are difficult to predict and measure, the practitioner is often left with confusion as to the best treatment option.

Access to education is one key to optimal choices. If the practitioner has had minimal exposure to current principals in cancer pain management, for example, he or she may still have concerns about the patient's potential for drug habituation. The debate over use of opiates in chronic nonmalignant pain may leave the practitioner in an "either/or" mindset, uncertain how to individuate pain management specifically for each patient. Resources for the Hawaii practitioner are listed in an attempt to support skilled pain management in Hawaii.
